PSYCHOLOGY
One of Chatham’s largest, the psychology minor gives students the opportunity to explore contemporary theory and research in psychology while teaching them to think scientifically about behavior and mental processes. Students in the program have flexibility to specialize within their minor on a wide range of topics in the world of psychology, including developmental, psychopharmacology, and abnormal behavior.

The program equips students with essential public speaking, interpersonal, and research skills that can be utilized in a variety of career sectors, including social services, counseling, education, management, and more.

Sample courses include:
- Motivation
- Personality
- Abnormal Behavior
- Psychopharmacology
- Child Development
- Social Psychology

“A psychology minor is a versatile option as it helps students explore the human mind and behavior—from understanding how neurons work to understanding societal conflict. Students are introduced to a broad array of perspectives in their major, including social, psychological, biological, and developmental—so they can pursue new skills, knowledge, and areas of expertise on their major disciplines or on their future academic and career paths.”
— DR. NICHOLE BAYLISS, associate professor & program coordinator

JEWISH STUDIES
The Jewish studies minor is an interdisciplinary study of Jewish history, literature, religion, culture, and art dating back centuries. Students explore the connections between past development and contemporary issues with regard to social, political, intellectual, economic, cultural, geographic, and technological spheres.

Aside from deepening cultural appreciation, this minor programs students for any endeavor in which they need to distinguish between fact and interpretation and comprehend their interrelationships; extract and interpret information from primary and secondary sources; and identify and critique arguments and evidence.

Courses include:
- Intro to Jewish Studies
- History of Judaism
- The Holocaust
- Exiles
- Jewish Pittsburgh

“Minoring in Jewish Studies gives me the opportunity to read and analyze texts that I otherwise would not have studied. It has allowed me to grow personally as I have broadened my worldview, and professionally as I have developed my analytical and professional writing skills.”
